PONTYPRIDD.

— o —

There is a Glory bright as morning breaking

Over the white crests of a lucent sea;

The Glory of a world to light awaking

That shines upon it from eternity.

Such is the Glory won by deeds of daring

Wrought not for fame, but human love and ruth;

With purpose high that never knows despairing,

Clear-eyed and fearless as immortal truth.

Such is the Glory won by heroes lowly

In life's obscurest byways day by day,

That crowns Humanity with lustre holy,

And shows God's image shining through its clay.

Deep in the working's pitchy gloom

Men are fast in a living grave,

Face to face with a fearful doom,

And God alone to save.

They hear the water's stealthy flow,

And they shrink from the gas-plague's breath,

While the minutes so swiftly go

That stand 'twixt them and death.

They feel the breath of prayer expire

In a sob of tearless despair;

While they shrink from a dumb desire

The worst at once to dare.

They think of wife and children left

Poor and desolate 'neath the sky;

Of love and hope at once bereft,

And feel it hard to die.

"Hold me closer!" a lad's voice said,

Faint and low, in the silence chill.

"They'll find us sure, alive or dead?"

"Yes; if it be God's will."

Oh! heroes, soiled with labour, horny-handed,

Who toiled so nobly for your brothers' lives,

'Gainst death in fellest shapes, so firmly banded,

To fight for weeping children, praying wives,—

Ye are our teachers, and ye teach us duty,

Not in smooth phrases, but in actions high;

Actions that still shall shine in deathless beauty

When blood-stained Fame is proved a braggart lie.
